

“ On May 30th I will be presenting the “Sustainable Indoor Climate Seminar”, in which I share insights into solar air conditioning that I have learned through my overseas Fellowship. There was considerable interest aroused which resulted from the report, and many subsequent developments to discuss.

You may therefore be interested in this seminar – solar cooling is a hot topic! ”

Warwick Johnston

The George Alexander Foundation/ISS Institute Fellow

Warwick’s passion for nature, along with engineering aptitude and communication skills, found application in his position of Project Development Engineer at one of Australia’s longest established solar energy and sustainable living companies, Going Solar. There Warwick has been responsible for the development of projects incorporating innovative aspects of renewable energy and sustainability, including such applications as PV, solar hot water, solar space heating, passive building design, rainwater harvesting, and system monitoring.

In expression of a strong motivation to make a positive impact upon the world, Warwick has designed Australia’s first solar powered freeway noise barrier, largest BIPV façade, and conducted a feasibility study for the incorporation of renewable energy into tsunami reconstruction efforts in the Maldives on behalf of the British Red Cross.
